Air Force Director of Personnel, Lt. Gen. Donald Peterson, visited Kunsan Wednesday. He was on a tour of Pacific Air Forces bases. The general spoke with Kunsan's personnel specialists at the Loring Club to find out what specific issues were at the Wolf Pack. He also met with Kunsan's Top Three enlisted committee and company grade officers. Lt. Gen. Peterson fielded questions from airmen ranging from recruiting, retention, promotion and other Air Force issues important to the airmen's careers. Look for an in depth interview with Lt. Gen. Peterson in the next issue of the Wolf Pack Warrior.

Engineering flight wins
Air Force best for 2000

Around Kunsan Air Base new construction is visible at nearly every turn. New four-story, 122-person dormitories have risen from ground zero; the West Winds Golf Course clubhouse opened after major renovations; and a new medical group facility addition is under construction.

Although civilian contractors construct these projects, the 25-person 8th Civil Engineer Squadron Engineering Flight's behind-the-scenes planning, designing and quality-control teams make these quality-of-life improvements a reality. The flight's staff takes an idea, work it from concept to a funded project and subsequently monitor the project to ensure U.S. construction standards are adhered to.

Recognizing the Herculean efforts of the flight's efforts, they were recently selected as the Brig. Gen. Archie S. Mayes Award winner for the best Air Force civil engineer squadron engineering flight.

The flight's three sections – plans and programs, design, and construction – rely on a mix of military personnel and Korean national employees.

Being at a smaller remote assignment with the high operations tempo makes winning the award a huge accomplishment, according to the flight's commander.

"This is a testimony not only to the flight's members now, but to the military members who were stationed here before us," said Maj. Steve Ziadie. "There's not a lot of military continuity here."

Because most of the flight's work involves long-term products, the superior Korean national employees' experience is incredible, the major explained.

"It's a testimony to our Korean
